

Dynamic Load Balancing for a Smart Grid

Introduction:

In this project, I built a simulated smart grid system that balances electric vehicle (EV) charging requests across multiple substations. The main challenge was to make sure no substation gets overloaded, by always sending new requests to the substation with the lowest current load. I also set up monitoring using Prometheus and Grafana.

System Architecture:

- charge_request_service: Entry point for EV charging requests (Python service).
- substation_service: Simulates a charging station, exposes its current load as a Prometheus metric.
- load_balancer: Polls all substations for their current load and routes each new request to the least loaded substation.
- Monitoring: Prometheus scrapes metrics from all substations, and Grafana visualizes the data.

All services are containerized and managed with Docker Compose.

Implementation Details:

- The load balancer periodically checks the /metrics endpoint on each substation.
- When a new charging request comes in, it forwards the request to the substation with the lowest load.
- Substations update their load metrics in real time.
- Prometheus collects all metrics, and Grafana displays them on a dashboard.

Testing and Analysis:

- I wrote a Python script to simulate a "rush hour" by sending lots of charging requests quickly.
- During the test, I watched the Grafana dashboard to see how the load was distributed.
- Screenshots from Grafana show that the load balancer successfully keeps all substations balanced, even under heavy load.
